

985 F222

UC-NRLF

$B 273 371

JOHN T. FARE

985 F222

Dr and Mrs Mary L. Johnson With compliments of the Author

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

TO MR.
J. T. FARE
ALBANY, N. Y.

John T. Fare

IN THE WILDERNESS

BY JOHN T. FARE
//

GRAFTON PUBLISHING COMPANY
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Copyright 1913
by
JOHN T. FARE
Los Angeles, California

"In My Father's House are Many Mansions, if it were not so, I would have told you."

—John 14; 2.

795268

To the Memory of the Mother who taught her lisping child to pray, this book is respectfully dedicated.

IN THE WILDERNESS

I.

The Azure Fields were veil'd as with a dew;

The Meadow-cups were lost to mortal
view;

The silvery Lake lent not its wonted
light,

For Gloom had stretch'd her canopy—
'twas Night.

II.

And Silence strange—as if the pulse of Time

Had ceased, and Neverness was in its prime,—

Did reign; and reigning augur'd things to be;

Things felt—by what? Ah! that's the mystery.

III.

But soon the calm was rent by clanging sound,

And voice was heard to make the hills resound

With cry for light unto the House of Brain—

List, list! The cry it doth repeat again.

IV.

“Within, within, kind friend, within, I say!

A child along life’s path hath lost its way.

I search for Light, if thou His servant
be,

Direct my path. Who, where, and what is He?”

V.

“Direct my path!” Indeed a prattling tongue
Hath struck full hard upon the mental gong,
And broke the peace. Wake, wake and cease to nod;
The child doth answer seek: Who—what is God?

VI.

’Tis cried full oft that the All-Good—the Just,
Made man in His own image from the dust;
And that the dust He chose from Mother Earth
Did faulty prove, and we’ve been damn’d from birth.

VII.

Wake, wake and lean to thought, and err
no more.

Go think of all who have gone on before,

Whose lives had been one endless living fear

Of Hell's torments for those they held most dear.

VIII.

Methinks no Dives cried with parching
tongue

For water, while the lambent flames among,

More loud than they will who with fear imbue

Their fellow-man with song of "Chosen few."

IX.

The "Chosen few"? The chosen are the whole,

The images of Truth—of Life's true
soul;

And one in all, and all in one combine

As radiating rays of Light Divine.

X.

Aye, rays; each one an offspring of the Just,

A heavenly guest within a House of dust,

Oh, care it well, it is the ever Thee!

Neglect it—and thine own deformer be.

XI.

I never gaze upon a cripple shorn
Of power but what my breast with grief is torn.

The Me therefore I'd care; for this I know,
That death is birth—and we have far to go.

XII.

So let us gather in this Error's thought,
And place it on the altar where 'twas wrought;

Then in the shadow of the Cross we'll stand
And watch the temple fall—'twas built on sand.

XIII.

The Barque we've piloted full many a year

With helm lash'd hard apart with thong of fear;

And in a circle it hath ever sail'd,

But haven sought for we have never hail'd.

XIV.

With bearings lost, with Compass gone before,

We tremble at the sound of breakers' roar.

"See, see, the path! Here footsteps mark the sea:

The Saviour pass'd this way from Galilee!"

XV.

The breakers of the There are far from Here;

The Here is but the Where of Truth held dear.

The There doth not exist to Mind Supreme;

The Here is Now, the Now is ever green.

XVI.

For God is Love, and Love is Life Divine;

He breathed the breath of Life, and life is thine;

And being thine it is the inner Thee;
And being mine it is the inner Me.

XVII.

That convoluted loom we call the brain,
With which we daily weave our bolt of pain,
Was made the shuttle of sweet Peace
to run;
The shuttle's thread of Grace—by God was spun.

XVIII.

But from a flax we've spun a faulty twine
To feed the cop from which the comb
to line,
Until the old machine cries out,
"Enough!
I've wrought too long with your sepulchral stuff.

XIX.

“The warp of Error’s thought hath strain’d the beam;
My shuttle it hath lost its heavenly gleam,
And bears a nap from out a dusty store;
’Twould see the smile of God. Enough
 —no more!”

XX.

His smile? Aye, smile. For dark indeed is day
When light is low and Grief’s old tent
 of gray
Is pitch’d, and tears flow. But there is light:
Peep through its rents—His stars with smiles are bright.

XXI.

Methinks, the Barque—of which I yet have spake—

Could float full well, and leave within its wake

A troubled stream, upon the briny tears

That Sorrow's eyes have shed in bygone years.

XXII.

Upon my window's pane a tear I see;
It runs—now stops as if in fear; maybe

It is in search of some familiar eye
With whom it made its home in years gone by.

XXIII.

Perhaps 'twas in some saintly cloister-cell,

Where devotee her matin beads did tell,

That it sought freedom from a pious orb

To join with Prayer that doth all grief absorb.

XXIV.

Aye, join with Prayer, that messenger of man

That to the Throne of Grace, since time began,

Hath borne our soul-thoughts; tho'ts, oft frank'd with tears,

That have return'd with Peace to still our fears.

XXV.

Our fears? The seed within a shadow's pod!

Hath Clay ta'en on the potency of God
And turned Artisan? The light turn on:

The pod is broken and the seed is gone.

XXVI.

The light turn on? From where, and when, and how?

The smile of God illumines the ever Now.

Turn on the light! Effect go rule the cause!

The cause, and whence came it? Divine Mind knows.

XXVII.

The great Omnipotent, Omniscient He!
The Omnipresent One to Thee and Me,—
But for the Dust that keeps our vision bound
In darkness, true unto the Mother Ground,—

XXVIII.

He knows. And will He hold us free from guile
Who help to make the Garment in a style
To hide the True—that He Himself had wrought,
And make shade substance, and the Substance naught?

XXIX.

That speck of dust that in the ray of light
Is ever seen in borrow'd garments dight, We'd turn into a beam of woeful
note;
The heavenly ray we'd thrust inside the mote.

XXX.

That which is, is, and will be so for aye;
And being so it cannot pass away.
For all things made were made by the
All Wise;
All else is shadow, from which errors rise.

XXXI.

He knows: The Father of the father,
He;

The Lord of lords who made the perfect Thee.

The perfect Me? The me that is, is what?

A shell—a shadow by a Shade begot.

XXXII.

Aye, by a Shade that sprang from False-hood's thought;

Begot in darkness, and by Darkness
wrought;

A semblance of a something that is naught,

That from the land of Nothingness was brought.

XXXIII.

The shell? Oh, rend its portals open wide,

As was the tomb from which the Crucified

In all His glory came; and see the Man,

The perfect Man, as when the world began.

XXXIV.

I scarce e'er listen to the ocean's roar,

Or see the waves in anger lash the shore,

But what, methinks, I see Golgotha sway

And rend itself—as on the Passion-day.

XXXV.

Or watch the heaving of its troubled breast,

When fleck'd with foam from off its tearful crest,

But what I see on lip the spumy stain,
And hear the Magdalene's cry of pain.

XXXVI.

And when the spray doth hap to touch
my lip,

As from the savor'd nebule I do sip,

Into my breast a kindly solace flows;
Perhaps it was His tear—who knows,
who knows.

XXXVII.

His tear, and brought by sobbing winds from mound

Where Error's ashes mark'd the whited
ground

That lay in shadow of that veil of woe
The angels rent when Dust was in its throe.

XXXVIII.

Aye, in deep throe was Garment of the Man,

A Garment wrought when world of Dust began;

By Adam to his offspring 'twas be-queath'd,

And all have worn, and wearing it have grieved.

XXXIX.

'Tis writ that Judas fell and bowels spew'd
Upon the ground. Methinks the Saviour hued
The very spot with crimson from the side
That knew the spear ere He scarce yet had died.

XL.

And as the stream gush'd forth from out the Fount
A quaking dread possess'd the skull-clad mount,
And with its fearful bosom's heaving waves
It waked the dead—who left their tainted graves.

XLI.

Oh, better far had Judas ne'er been born Than till the Dust that gave to life a thorn,

Whose cruel teeth were pointed as with steel,

To rend the brow that bore the Heavenly Seal.

XLII.

Methinks I see the passion'd face of Love,
With pleading look, turn to the heavens
above,

And cry, ere yet His eyes were lost to view,

"Father, forgive! They know not what they do."

XLIII.

“Father, forgive!” With pity’s soulful cry

He pleaded for mankind with Life on high.

That prayer divine let memory sacred keep,

For with the plea on tongue He went to sleep.

XLIV.

Oh, glorious morn that saw the Saviour
rise

A victor o’er the tomb where Error lies!

And in His Majesty and Truth appear Unto the one redeem’d—by Him held dear.

XLV.

Aye, the redeem'd. The one that He had brought
From out the labyrinth of Error's thought
Into the open of the Heavenly Way,
When cast aside as one unclean—by Clay.

XLVI.

As one unclean, a wanderer unknown
To all save them who had with Error grown;
And in the pool of Deep Despair they dwell,
A surging mass within a grieving hell.

XLVII.

Yet from its deep comes hand in wake of hand

With clawing sweep, as if to reach the land;

Like wind-spiced sails—when mill is hid from view,

They pass from sight—perhaps to try anew.

XLVIII.

And if perchance a one should hap to hit

Upon the Rock, and creep from out the pit,

Some Levite of the Dust—in Virtue's
name,

Will cry, "Unclean! Unclean! Hence whence you came."

XLIX.

Unclean! Unclean the Clay of man's own kind?

Unclean the tenement wherein the mind
Doth dwell? Then, like the Magdalene, go

Unto the Fount—there cleansing waters flow.

L.

With Garment soil'd with frailty's earthy spot

She sought the Life to free her from the blot;

And from her eyes repentant tears did stray

To lave His feet—they wash'd her sins away.

LI.

Methinks I see her as with tear-clad face

She humbly kneels imploring Him for grace;

Imploring with that silence of despair
That's voiced by falling tears—each tear a prayer.

LII.

And now a sound like unto wafting wings
I hear. A heavenly sound and one that brings

The thought of angels speeding down to greet

A soul redeem'd—low at the Saviour's feet.

LIII.

No anger'd cry, from Him, no loathing look
As from the ground the penitent He took;
But with a voice that brought to grief
surcease
He said, "Thy faith hath saved thee—go in peace."

LIV.

"Thy faith hath saved." Oh, would that child-like trust
Were fully mine! Then from this Shell of Dust
I'd speed the webs that on its walls
recline,
And let the light of God in fullness shine.

LV.

Methought my house in order I had placed,
And from its corners all the spots erased;
Its windows they were bright, and many a ray
Of sunshine to my chamber found its way.

LVI.

Its portals knew no dust—though some ajar,
And kindly visitors from out the far—
In thought, did often come and chat with me
About the heavenly Now—the Then to be.

LVII.

But stranger came: I welcome gave to him,

And held converse, when, lo, the light grew dim,

For window's pane was veil'd with web
of gray;

A Spider! Ah, we all must watch and pray!

LVIII.

The garden of despair—Gethsemane, Did e'en the spinning Weaver know, for
he

A web did weave within its troubled shade

That caught the passion'd tears of Him who pray'd.

LIX.

And with the glistening tears the webby shroud
Was 'lumed e'en as a lamp to mark the crowd
That writhing surged in Error's dark abyss,
From which—like serpent, crept the Judas-kiss.

LX.

Aye, crept like serpent under night's deep shade
To kiss the cheek of one he had betray'd;
For darkness is the breath that Error
 breathes,
And breathing it, it slays whom it de-ceives.

LXI.

How oft we mortals sit and strain the eye

To see the work that in the lap doth lie,
When worldly winter, with its weather-stain,

Hath curtain'd out the light from window's pane.

LXII.

Aye, strain to see the lines by Artist made,

That we with wisdom's thread must mark to shade

And fashion incorruption's Emblem Rose;

But, ah, alas!—how oft the Cypress grows.

LXIII.

Our trembling fingers, with their coats of stain

Drawn by the temper'd needle's point, would gain,

By labor—foreign to all rest, the bread
To feed the that with which the worms are fed.

LXIV.

And in our haste and deep forgetfulness,

The sop for That within grows daily less,

Until the larder proves an empty bowl
With ne'er a crumb to feed the hunger'd Soul.

LXV.

Methinks I hear the man-wrought needle
cry—

“Why thrust your flimsy thread into my eye?

You start with pain if I your finger wound!

Then why not I? Your logic is unsound.

LXVI.

“’Tis said that you from common dust were made,

From dust that Time amid the dust had laid,

And that an artisan of standing high Did draw you forth. Well, cousin—so was I.”

LXVII.

Each day we meet with kindred long unknown,
As o'er this sand-dune by the winds we're blown;
We meet them here, and then we meet them there,
In fact, like dust, we meet them everywhere.

LXVIII.

And one and all seem foreign to the place,
And wavering stand—as if they would retrace
Their steps, then speed to left and then to right,
Again to left, and then—alas! 'tis Night.

LXIX.

Oh, blessed He who did in ages gone Reverse the stone that mark'd the pathway wrong!

A path that's led us to this dusty plain,
Far from the land of Light that we would gain.

LXX.

But mortal eyes inured to shade of night,
That we would turn unto the heavenly
light,
Are, in their weakness, blinded by its ray,
And we still need His voice to lead the way.

LXXI.

For Love's bright beams arise on every side

That marks the Narrow Path, that in the Wide—

Where whirlwinds dance with dust, whose revelry
Is cradled in its grave—we never see.

LXXII.

And in our mazy state we're prone to read
The signs and symbols—that are placed to lead,

From right to left, until, some late, we learn
That we're astray, and know not where to turn.

LXXIII.

Full many a morn we've seen, whose winning smile
Hath drawn us far afield with witching
 guile,
 That did o'ersoon upon us turn with lash
Of wind and rain midst laughing thunder's crash.

LXXIV.

For through the lenses of the mortal eye
We see the "Evening's red" when morn is nigh,
 And augur that the day full bright will be,
And sup with Sorrow ere the night we see.

LXXV.

For with the dust the wind will ever play

And toss it hither, thither, everyway;

So that the Night oft laughs and cries to Morn,

“My friend, you sow’d the seed—go reap the thorn!”

LXXVI.

Seed—Error sown! The dead harvest the dead!

Whence came this seed—in what pod was it bred?

Its spark of life, from what source was it drawn?

Not from the mouth of God. Then hence the spawn.

LXXVII.

For life—eternal, true, was breathed by

Love

To fill all space—the Here, the There
above;

And filling space the Omnipresent He Hath made all one by heavenly alchemy.

LXXVIII.

And being one the smile of the Divine Within my neighbor as myself doth shine;

And shining it reflects the living Light,
The Light that knows no darkness of the Night.

LXXIX.

And from it flows an ever pulsing stream
Of love to heal the ills of life's false dream;

And healing, leaves the Man—as He had wrought,
An offspring of Himself—a perfect Thought.

LXXX.

But as the running waters pass from sight
Beneath the stratum that impedes their flight,
So in the long ago love's stream ran low
Beneath the bank of Sin where Sorrows grow.

LXXXI.

And all was dark until the heavenly One,

Whose lowly birth the guiding star shone
on,

Did rend the brank Cimmerian full wide
With light of Truth—and rending bruised
His side.

LXXXII.

And from the light did radiate a beam
Of love that brought unto the blind the gleam

Of day; and in the sorrowing house of death

It brought unto the dead a living breath.

LXXXIII.

And for the lost illumed the sought-for
way,
And gently led the ones who had astray
In darkness gone, back to the path of peace,
Where flowers grow, and sorrow finds surcease.

LXXXIV.

Methinks I hear Bethesda's arched vault
Give echo to the cries of blind and halt;
Cries from the past that do its curtain raise,
And on the scenes of long ago I gaze.

LXXXV.

I see the crippled, palsied—youth and age,
Of life's great tome a torn and tatter'd page,

Each one intent on leaping in the tide
Ere doth the stricken brother at his side.

LXXXVI.

Each with an eye or ear attuned to catch The moment when the troubled water's latch

Shall rise, and portal open for the guest,
Whose touch to faith-clad brings a healing rest.

LXXXVII.

While on a pallet, near the pool, there lies

A palsied form—full old, who ever cries,

“Oh, for the love of God, come aid me lend

To water’s edge, ere angel does descend!”

LXXXVIII.

And cry in vain? No, not in vain; for
he

Did sup from cup of loving sympathy

And rise renew’d—free from all ill and care,

At Life’s command—for Christ was there.

LXXXIX.

And in the Now as in the Then the same Light glows to lead the fallen, blind and lame ;

And glowing, lights the pathway to the Gate,

Where they who have gone on do us await.

XC.

And o'er its archway, writ in rubied hue,
The Master's call—for all, not for the few,

“ALL YE WHO TOIL AND ARE WITH GRIEF OPPRESS'D,

COME UNTO ME AND I WILL GIVE YOU REST.”

XCI.

And that is Love. His message it is thine,

'Twas Magdalene's—Mary's—and 'tis mine,

And comes as manna did in ages past,
So that our hunger'd souls may break the fast.

YB 12198

795268

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

